About the Seminar

Literature is a medium of expression. It is an expression of the experiences of life: experiences of various kinds--pleasing or painful; happy or hurting; appeasing or disappointing. When these experiences result from expatriation, a different dimension comes to be interwoven. Though globalisation often gestures homely, a feeling of "homelessness" often haunts an expatriate. And there emerges the notion of diaspora. A major theme of diasporic writing is the occupation of feasible space for both living and loving. Such a thing remains an outsider both to the new culture and to that of the homeland. Another significant theme is dual identity, the conflict between a person's ethnic legacy and the individual "new" identity. The ambivalent desire for the universal synchronisation and the ethnic affiliation makes a crisis inevitable.

Globalisation has paved the way for the expansion of diaspora literature. It is chiefly about images of adaptation of the writer's subconscious memories in the host culture. There is emotional crisis of self and nationality; there is a discovery of one's self as the centre of human existence. Diaspora literature reflects culture, tradition, social values and even history through the depiction of life in native and host country. The writers of this genre re-live in their memories to perceive the present. The ultimate upshot is an exclamation for the crisis of space and identity.
